Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: .in the first experiments an effort was made to utilize as much as possible of the old writing. The Spencerian letter forms were straightened up producing a style, the chief objectional test some European styles, but these we found to lack system, and many of the letter forms are incompatible with natural writing movements. The apparently excellent results shown in some circulars are either mere tracings or pen-drawings, and are in no proper sense writing. It may be worth noting that whenever one sees specimens in which there is a great precision in the height and spacing of letters, or in the likeness of recurring letters, he may know the work has been laboriously drawn out, and what, at a superficial glance seems excellent, is really very bad, considered as training in writing. Then followed the development of the style illustrated by plate II. The con...
